2. Citations and explanations

The present application meets the criteria in PCT Article 33(2) and (3), and therefore the subject matter of claims 1-13 is novel and inventive:

Description of the invention: The invention pertains to a method and device for evaluating useful information received via a communications network, said useful information containing data consisting of text telephone data and speech data, characterized in that, by means of a statistical analysis of the useful information, the reliability data concerning an error concealment are forwarded after reception to an error correction module in order to improve decoding of the text telephone data.

Prior art: WO-A-98/48531 discloses a method for concealing errors in an audio data stream. Errors occurring in the audio data stream are replaced by a subgroup of intact audio data. These intact audio data are analysed statistically in order to calculate their spectral energy and thereby create substitute data which are suitable for the erroneous audio data.

Objective problem: To avoid expensive error concealment signalling for the decoding of text telephone data.

Solution: The error concealment is signalled with reliability data by means of a statistical calculation of the signal energy of the audio data stream and text telephone data.

Assessment of the difference: The subject matter of the solution is novel (PCT Article 33(2)) and involves an inventive step (PCT Article 33(3)) which is neither obvious nor derivable.
